

The Quick Version of the Story...

Romulus and Remus had a rough childhood—they were raised by a wolf. In fact, they weren't even supposed to be alive.

Several years before the two brothers were born, their grandfather—who was a King—had a falling out with his brother. It didn't end so well, and the King was dethroned.

Some time passed before the feuding brother learned that the former King's daughter had become the mother of twin boys, Romulus and Remus (by the way, their father was Mars, the Roman God of War). The brother worried that the boys would grow up to avenge their disgraced grandfather. Around 771 BC, he sent a servant to kill the young babies.

The servant couldn't bring himself to do it. He placed the twins in a cradle and sent them down the Tiber River. As luck would have it, a female wolf found Romulus and Remus

A Fun Fact

At birth, Romulus and Remus were placed into a basket and sent down the river.

A similar scene appeared in the Biblical story of Moses, and later in Greek Mythology with the story of Perseus.
